SAMPLE EDIT

Relationships are a part of life. The relationships we have with others, family, and friends will affect every aspect of our lives. They also provide for our most basic human needs, to have fulfilling life, and encourage us to be our fullest potential. They sustain us in our personal development and growth as we go through life. The family unit is very important whether you are a child or an adult. It is the substance to how each one of us grows and interacts with each other. It strengthens bonds and trust. As we grow, we learn not just from our parents but from life experiences along the way.

Re-enforcement of values and beliefs are what makes us who we are as individuals. For example, when we have support and confidence from family and others that helps mold us into what we want and need as a part of society. It is never just one single thing that makes an individual who they are. It is those who have helped us and given us guidance and yes even at times taught us that choices have consequences and that is a learning experience as well.

Relationships play a central role throughout our lives. The Family structure may be different for every individual. For example, whether our family structure is composed of a mother, father, grandparents, or foster parents, it is important that individuals have support from others that can enhance their well being. Strong support is good for individuals and is good for their well being.

Sometimes when a family structure changes, so does the individual. This can be good for individuals as well.
